GET THE JOB | INTERVIEW TIP

Get Some Coaching

Just as an athlete hones his skills before the big game, you should work out your technique before an interview.

One way to hone your communication and presentation skills is by hiring a professional career coach. Optimizing your interview style takes time and practice. Having someone to professionally critique your performance while also giving you ideas on how to improve can help give you the confidence you need before your next interview.

LOOK FOR A CERTIFICATION

You may be intimidated when it comes to finding a great career coach. One search online will uncover hundreds of professionals claiming to be your best resource for interview tips and career guidance. One major factor of your decision-making process should be certifications.

Credentials aren't necessary to become a great interview coach, but they will give you the peace of mind that you are hiring a credentialed professional. Look for certifications from the Career Coach Training & Certification Program or the Professional Association of Resume Writers and Career Coaches.

These are the industry standards that prepare coaches for guiding you through your career journey. This includes how to best prepare you for interview questions, both conversational and challenging in nature.

STICK LOCAL FOR PERSONALIZED SERVICE

When it comes to choosing an interview coach, local is generally better. A professional coach in your area will be able to not only run you through interview preparation tips on the phone but in person, as well.

You will be able to run through mock interviews in person, giving you the experience and practice of answering questions with an audience. Nothing can substitute authentic preparation, and hiring a local professional to help strengthen your interview skills is the way to achieve this.

Check with your local employment services organization or your local college for referrals.

GET THE JOB | DEALING WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Job Search Stress

If you've been unemployed for any length of time or have found yourself unhappy at work, you understand that the job search process can be stressful.

While stress can be both beneficial and detrimental to your employment situation, it's important to keep it in perspective so it doesn't hamper your career prospects.

Another reason to keep your stress in check is your health. Extreme stress can have major consequences that can affect the immune, cardiovascular, neuroendocrine and central nervous systems, according to the American Psychological Association.

The association also reports that untreated chronic stress can result in serious health conditions including anxiety, insomnia, muscle pain, high blood pressure and a weakened immune system. Additionally, research has linked stress to the development of major illnesses, such as heart disease, depression and obesity. All the more reason to manage your stress during your job search. Much more than your career is at stake.

There are many ways you can curb your stress as you focus on the excitement associated with your job hunt. Here are a few:

Find time for your hobby. Between submitting your resume for open jobs, don't forget to enjoy the things that make you unique. Play the drums? Hit the skins to take your mind off the job search and relieve some stress in the process. Like to garden? Take a stroll through your outdoor oasis to reconnect to the peaceful respite of nature. These types of hobbies are great for removing you from the stress of job hunting and allowing your mind to focus elsewhere, if only for a short period of time.

Exercise. Working out regularly is instrumental to better health and a less stressful life. Take 20 minutes from your job search today and head out on a rigorous walk.

Are you a member at your local gym? Join a class to supplement your regular workout sessions. The extra cardio you can pick up through spinning, aerobics or basketball can help keep your body fit and your mind sharp during this stressful time.
