City ponders lagoon questions

BY LOUISA BARBER SIDNEY HERALD

Despite local rumblings that the city of Sidney is under serious state scrutiny because of the ailing lagoon system, a consultant says the city isn't in any trouble yet.

"They're not taking any action against the city," said Patrick Murtagh, senior design engineer with Murtagh Municipal Engineering, the firm hired by the city to examine the system.

But on Monday, during the Sidney City Council meeting, officials were warned that even though the city isn't yet bound by order to fix it, officials may want to consider fixing it. The 50-year-old system does not meet Montana Department of Envi-ronmental Quality's design standards, though Murtagh concluded it doesn't yet pose a threat to public health and safety. During an examination, Murtagh found the wastewater system has too much "organic material" and water to function the way it was designed.

Public works director Jeff Hintz said the lagoon is getting "healthier" but is not at 100 percent. The spring season helps because the natural aeration allows oxygen into the system to allow bacteria to grow.

The city has two lagoons, though only one has been in operation since it was built. One leaked so bad it couldn't be filled with water. It is now being used to leak the water from the working lagoon to the ground as an "infiltration/percolation" pond.

With future growth on the horizon, the city will need to add subdivisions to its wastewater system. The lagoon is just too full, however, so what is the city to do?

A SOLUTION?

You've gotten a lot of attention lately. The state is aware of recent issues with the lagoon. They do read the papers and all," Murtagh told the council, "and they've decided that they're no longer going to accept waivers for the subdivisions." The state, he said, needs to be shown there's capacity in the system before it would approve anymore subdivisions. Since it can't take additional outside wastewater sources (the city deemed it "dead" last month), city leaders can enter into what's called an administrative order of consent in which the city commits to bringing it up to design standards.

The city, officially acknowledging its system is out of compliance, would have four years to solve the issues. "During that time, the city can continue to grow, but they have to make that big jump and make that commitment," Murtagh said, a commitment to fixing the lagoon entirely, not patching it.

Whether the city continues to grow or not, it must upgrade the system which has had very little

Sunrise Manor continues success

Mayor responds to criticism from public BY LOUISA BARBER

SIDNEY HERALD

In a prepared address Monday evening, Sidney Mayor Bret Smelser praised the Sidney City Council amidst public criticism that leaders were not prepared for the impending oil activity.

"You and I both have endured extended negative polls in the local paper on how prepared we were even when the press and most of the public know we've been working on impact infrastructure and permanent oil revenue stream since 2004," Smelser said.

The letter comes after a month-long online poll on the Herald's website in which 54 percent of voters said the city and county leaders' actions to deal with oil impacts have been unacceptable. Twenty-six percent said they've done OK but could have planned better. Fifteen

In existence since 2004, the Savage Sunrise Manor is meeting the need of a place for elderly to live in their community.

The constant drive for improvements was aided when Sunrise Manor was awarded a $6,000 check Wednesday from PPL Montana for the installation of handicapped accessible escape routes at the facility as well as a new commercial refrigerator.

Larysa Hurst, manager of Savage Sunrise Manor, notes other recent improvements have included flower pots, benches and a new generator.

Leslie Messer, Savage, who is a community fund advisory board member for PPL Montana, says Sunrise Manor is an important element of the community as longtime residents can keep in contact with their children and grandchildren as well as friends. The building is located across from the school's football field.

said. She adds children come and sing to resident, and pastors preach at the facility. During a community catfish tournament, residents got their share of catfish and potatoes. "They were the first ones fed," Messer said.

The community supports the facility through several fundraising events. The next one is a barbecue on July 1.

To help keep the facility up to date, SAVAGE Inc. board member Melissa Papka wrote the grant request to PPL Montana. Out of 108 applicants, the one for Sunrise Manor was one of 18 approved.

Lisa Perry, PPL Montana's community affairs manager, made the check presentation Wednesday. PPL Montana created its Community Fund to further strengthen the partnership between PPL Montana and its communities. Under the direction of a statewide advisory board, PPL Montana has awarded $1.5 million since 2005. That money has helped more than 230 Montana organizations that share PPL Montana's commitment to education, environmental responsibility and economic development.

Messer says organizations can apply for grants at www.pplmontana.com. The deadline for the next round of grants is July 31.

percent of voters said the leaders have done well.

Smelser addressed criticizers, acknowledging the council's "proactive" stance on the lagoon, which was declared "dead" to outside sources last month, by purchasing 147 acres around it. He praised the council for dedicating $100,000 a year, except for the last two years, to rebuild the lagoon to accommodate future growth and bring it up to code, even though the city lacked financial resources to complete the project. He also commended the board for laying down $650,000 of the $800,000 in oil revenue to install the north sewer trunk line that will serve future housing in north Sidney.

"Still, we have the faces and voices of those who say you're not moving fast al agent. The grant is in response to some of the oil boom's impacts in the area.

"It has a lot to do with the increasing population and the increasing demands on local law enforcement," DiFonzo said.

Sidney's chief of police says the most popular drugs in the area currently appear to be meth and marijuana. "But the potential for other drugs is out there.³

The Big Muddy River Drug Task Force covers the counties of Richland, Roosevelt, Valley, Daniels and Sheridan. Richland County has been a contributing member since the Task Force's inception in 1996.

The Montana Board of Crime Control has allocated more than $4 million in federal funding to local and state governmental agencies, law enforcement agencies and community organizations in order to provide resources to address crime. and provide criminal and juvenile justice services statewide.

The board approved $4,056,124 for 100 programs operated by counties, tribal governments and state agencies in the areas of juvenile delinquency, assist victims and provide funding for regional drug task forces.

"These grants come at a time when agency budgets are strapped and crime prevention needs have grown," board chairman Mike Anderson said in a press release. "We welcome the innovative programs that these critical resources provide to help keep citizens and their communities safe."
