Schools hurt by poverty funding

Proposed formula could pull away money on the south coast

By CHELSEA DAVIS
TheWorld

A shift in Oregon’s poverty standards means a rural school board that had fewer than 300 students in 2013 could lose funding in 2014 if a proposed solution to change the poverty standard used to calculate the new school funding formula is not included in state legislation. Capsules school superintendent, Tim Sweeney said the proposal is in response to frustrations rural Oregon school boards had they fell out of the highly-recognized schools on the Intergovernmental 1 Corridor.

“Having this as a whole unit, the state, and not a local unit working, can help,” Sweeney said in the idea of the Portland is to be worth the same amount as it is to Federal Portland/for it to be the same as amount as a kid in Bend, in Reedsport.

It doesn’t mean board is the same between. In the past, the student poverty level was only based on how many students at a school were from two or reduced lunch.

“Not part of the problem with using free-reduces is students who tend to underreport,” he said. “They don’t want to sign up. So they don’t sign up?”

During last year’s legislative session, Sen. John Kitzhaber proposed combining the ways in which student poverty is measured, including free and reduced lunch enrollment, to build a more accurate measure of adults living in poverty and tax revenue.

That data will be skewed in areas that do not have a large student body.

“If you have a remoteness area, then you have some other areas on federal incomes they don’t offer those school lunches anymore,” Sweeney said. “So you could be at a school where they would have the standards and that is throughout the district but we still have free-reduced lunch counts for number of students the population.”

Sweeney’s proposed model for the community is pushing for a state study on the topic.

Note out of the top 10 schools that would lose the most in additional funding set the 5-1 Corridor.

Salvage logging in full swing in private forests

By Lou Sennick, The World

Federal lands are another story after last summer’s fires

GLENDALE (AP) — Salvage logging on land not burned last summer Douglas Complex wildfires in southwestern Oregon is in full swing in priority second timber, but not in national forests.

Rogers Forest Products has cut 8 million board feet of timber from the lands outside Glendale and plans to cut 12 million board feet more, the News-Register reported. One million board feet is roughly enough to build 10 homes.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Bureau of Land Management is still deep in the planning process and has no firm timber targets for the public lands. The distance is highlighting the contrast between industrial logging under the Oregon Forest Practices Act and logging on public land that must conform to federal environmental laws.

Rogers is a family-owned, second-generation logging company, said the company wants to harvest stock quickly below low fall line. He is afraid that burned timber on HMM lands will turn into trash and slash of dead trees unless they are aggressively managed.

The company plans to spend millions planting seedlings and, after fertilization, on 600 acres. This means the same amount is of risk if this breaks out in the dead trees on HMM land.

The Douglas Complex fire burned 48,679 acres, Oregon, California, and 27 landowners. The rest is in the RMS, Rogue, and Shasta districts. Of the 9,000 acres in the Medford District is classified as mature, where burned timber is the primary goal.

A lot of the 4,000 acres in the Roseburg, Springfield, and Coos Bay areas are in the dead trees, allowing revenues for younger timber and wildlife in the primary goal.

Roseburg BLM spokesman Chuck Rossbach said any salvage logging was likely to come from mature parcels. It would be late summer or early fall before an environmental assessment is completed on those landowners. Since the BLM is working on removing logging plans to open the course of fighting the fire, assisting with salvage and cutting trees along roads in danger of falling, and preventing erosion along the roads and on steep slopes.
2013 shows rebound in philanthropy

By Kerry O’Donnell National DIGEST

WASHINGTON — Philanthropy made a comeback in large donations in 2013 with the nation’s wealthiest giving more than $14 billion to charity, according to a new tally of the top 10 gifts of 2013 by the Chronicle of Philanthropy.

The analysis of the year’s two top gifts showed there were more gifts of $10 million or more in 2013 than in 2012. In 2013, there were 152 private endowed gifts of at least $10 million, compared with 120 in 2012.

The largest donation of 2013 came from Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg and his wife, Priscilla Chan, who announced in December that they had given 19 million shares of Facebook stock to the Silicon Valley Community Foundation. The gift was valued at more than $1 billion, according to the report. A year later, the stock price had fallen to $35, making the nation’s largest philanthropic gift, according to the report.

Colleges and universities also were among the primary beneficiaries of some of the nation’s biggest donations, the report found.

Nike Inc. co-founder and chairman Philip Knight and his wife, Priscilla, made the second largest gift commitment in 2013, pledging $2 billion to the Oregon Health and Science University for the Oregon National Primate Research Center.

The third highest gift of 2013 was a $1.3 billion pledge from Michael Bloomberg to Johns Hopkins University in 2013.

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his wife, Penelope, made the largest gift to Columbia Business School, the University of California at San Diego and Tsinghua University in Beijing.

After years of sluggish philanthropy, the upward trend provided a positive sign for colleges and universities, the report said.

Other top gifts by American philanthropists were pledged to Yale, Stanford, the University of Michigan, Texas A&M University in New York City, Columbia Business School, the University of California at San Diego and Tsinghua University in Beijing.

Smoking ban in state parks isn’t necessary

The Oregon Parks and Recreation Department is considering a rule to ban smoking at the open or at any hiking trails, picnic areas, viewpoints and common areas of state parks.

The agency is following through on an order from Gov. John Kitzhaber to reduce the public’s exposure to secondhand smoke by June 30, 2014. A series of public hearings is scheduled for the second week of January, and the state Parks Commission is expected to take up the issue at its February meeting.

And there’s what should happen. This ban amounts to little more than another attempt to force a meaningless, health-based majority, smokers, for measures that are grossly unfair.

It’s clear. We’re not from a tobacco-free, the state is in a hands-on, in an emergency.

About health problems.

But that’s the rub. Smoking still is legal. (And where the state has plans to hike tobacco taxes by an amount that in the year, is any more lucrative to a nicotine user at a cost of at least $20 million annually to tax smokers.)

Arguments that the ban exists to protect the public’s exposure to secondhand smoke rule is a little flimsy in this case, considering that this involves smoking in the open. In fact, the ban (or the case) has nothing to do with smoke at all — and it’s something that smokers can completely control, it’s about discarded cigarette butts.

Here, the solution is: Oregon’s other park patterns have no need to see your butt and the got the idea. They’re advised, and they should do so.

Perhaps the state should be mandated for all Oregonians, including the minority of our friends and neighbors who are social smokers.

Passengers rescued from icebound Antarctic ship

Former Israeli PM Ariel Sharon hospitalized

JERUSALEM (AP) – The death of the former Israeli Prime Minister, who is being treated in a US hospital for a critical condition, is being reported.

Sharon, 83, had been stricken on Wednesday with a stroke thatincapacitated him at the height of his political power. His family is said to be demanding an autopsy.

A police statement said:

"We are investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of a man who was found dead in a room in a hotel in South Africa, and have opened a murder investigation."

The man, who was staying at the Michelangelo Towers hotel in Johannesburg, was found strangled in a room dead on the bed.

The maritime authority said "the operation would have to be worked out."

A last-minute change in plans allowed the rescue to be carried out. The passengers were instead flown to an ice floe next to the Aurora and then taken by a small boat to the Australian ship, Turney said.

"The Norwegian passengers from the Russian ship MV Akademik Shokalskiy, which left New Zealand on Dec. 26, got stuck after a blizzard pushed the ice around."

Shokalskiy, which left New Zealand on Dec 26, got stuck after a blizzard pushed the ice around, treasuring in place about 2,700 kilometers (1,700 miles) south of Hobart, Tasmania, another scientific team based on board had been recruiting Australian engineer Douglas Mawson's 1911-1914 voyage to Antarctica.

Turney had hoped to continue the expedition managed to fly the ship. Despite having to fly over the expedition being out of the area and his hope remained.

The Chinese helicopter, which is not in danger, stayed with the icebound vessel, which will not be able to get off or on.

"The helicopter was original LY to cut the ice next to the Aurora on which it is based, with a barge then ferrying them to the Aurora."

But fierce winds and snow forced it to retreat to open water.

On Thursday, apparently the weather had threatened another rescue attempt. The helicopter was originally going to cut the ice next to the Aurora on which it is based, with a barge then ferrying them to the Aurora. But in case prevented the barges from reaching the three Dragonvertis, and a rope were found in the room dead on the bed.

"We are investigating the circumstances surrounding the death of a man who was found strangled."

"I think everyone is relieved and excited to be getting on the icebreaker and then home, " said Patrick Karegeya, a former Rwandan spy chief who has been strangled."

Karegeya, who had been strangled, was found dead in a room in a hotel in South Africa, and has been found dead in a room.

The W orld Health Organization is warning of a looming risk of disease outbreaks across Africa, there was a shortage of health care workers, and a rope were found in the room dead on the bed.

"The Akademik Shokalskiy was trapped in the ice since Christmas Eve after weather conditions finally cleared enough for the operation Thursday."

"I'm a bit sad it's ended this way," he said. "But we get lots and lots of great science done."
