Eugene Levy Guest-Stars on NBC Comedy

Candace Havens FYI Television, Inc.

While there have been a number of dramas that have successfully transferred from Canada to the United States, there aren't that many comedies. "Working the Engels," airing Thursday at 8:30 p.m. on NBC, is a Canadian production that NBC hopes will make Americans laugh.

The setup is a slightly dysfunctional family who recently lost their patriarch and found themselves several hundred thousand dollars in debt. It might not sound so funny at first, but the way they try to make money is. The father had a law firm, which daughter Jenna (Kacey Rohl) is desperately trying to keep afloat. It isn't easy with her overly dramatic mother, Ceil (Andrea Martin), as the paralegal. Her pill-popping sister, Sandy (Azura Skye), is the receptionist, and her brother, Jimmy (Benjamin Arthur), has turned away from his petty criminal past to help with the investigations for the firm.

The show was shot in Toronto, which was the only way the producers were able to get comedy veteran Martin to participate. "I think that was a really important thing for Andrea," says Arthur. "It was a selling point because, you know, as much as Andrea isn't a born Canadian, she did marry one. So, all of her children are Canadian. So, she's dual. She spends most of her time in New York, but she does also own a home in Toronto. And I think it was really important for her to go back up, and she loves Toronto. She loves being there. She has a ton of friends there."

The show was able to pull in many Canadian comedy guest stars as well. "When we have Martin Short and Andrea Martin together in a scene, you really have to shake yourself once in a while and kind of go, 'Don't forget, you have a job to do.' You really have to be acting in the scene. You have to focus on the professional stuff because vou can't just sit around and laugh your butt off. You really become an audience member. It's tough. And when you have someone like Martin Short on set, you really kind of take anything that you're deciding to do as far as quirky or that might be over the top, and you tone it down because you want Martin to go in that direction."

But Arthur says when he does need to go over the top, he's not afraid. "I have no shame," he laughs. "I think as long as it makes somebody laugh, I have absolutely no shame in doing it. I think that has always been a part of me. I feel like I will put myself out there and I will do the most ridiculous things. I'll be the idiot for 22 minutes every week if it will make people laugh."

That doesn't mean Arthur can't feel awkward at times. "There's an episode where I have to basically make out with one of our neighbors, and she's been a longtime friend for years," says the actor. "Well, it turns out that she's the daughter of a prominent businessperson who's about to give the law firm a bunch of work, and I have to make out with her. Anyway, the girl gets cast and she comes to the set. I found out that she's Eugene Levy's daughter (Sarah Levy).

"He's the guest star for that week, but it's his actual daughter who has been cast as his daughter on the show. So, when I'm making out behind Eugene Levy's back, I have to make out with his actual daughter. You want to talk about awkward? That was probably one of the most awkward things I've ever had to do. 'Hi, Eugene, I'll be the guy making out with your daughter. OK? And action."

Former "Beverly Hills, 90210" star Jason Priestly directed several episodes of the series. Arthur had known him when they worked for HBO Canada on different shows. "It was the first time I ever worked with a director who was still an actor," says Arthur. "It helps. There are times when you get stuck. Jason got the script and would go, "These lines aren't reading well.' Then he would kind of walk himself through the scene. He would figure out the pace, and then he'd turn when you did the turn and grab whatever you grabbed. And then he'd go, 'I really think this is where we should be focusing. I think if you directed your attention into this area as opposed to hearing it ...' I was like, 'Dude, I love you."

SUNDAY Ice Lake Rebels

Animal Planet, 9 p.m. The freeze and thaw periods are the two most deadly times of the year on Great Slave Lake among Canada's Northwest Territories, and here Gary Vallaincourt and a handful of other survivalists hunt for food, drill for water, trade for necessities and protect their turf. It's a lawless frozen lake of ultra-libertarians forced together during brutal winters. Choosing another kind of lifestyle, these rebels have bid farewell to living life the conventional way on land and traded it in for floating homes and houseboats. Since they don't live on land, they don't pay taxes, and, therefore, no one polices them. The very things that we take for granted -- from opening the front door, to walking your pet, to shopping for groceries and supplies - are incredibly difficult to navigate. As one rebel says, "It's not man you have to worry about, it's woman" - Mother Nature.

Wild Predators Move into Town

Dan Rice FYI Television, Inc.

As human populations increase, our need to expand our cities has encroached upon the natural habitats of wild predators, which now have no recourse but to venture into those cities in search of dwindling prey and water sources. As alarming as that may be in itself, consider that in many cases these apex hunters are not only adapting to city life, they are thriving. National Geographic takes viewers around the world to witness these growing instances of surprising coexistence on the three-hour television event "Urban Jungle," beginning Sunday at 7 p.m.

Divided into hours covering wildlife relocating to downtown, suburban and outpost areas of human civilization, the program details how these dangerous animals are not just extending their hunting ranges but are moving in to stay, and adjusting their own nature to accommodate their new environment.

"Although there are at times negative things that do happen, there are populations that really have learned how to exist there," explains host Boone Smith, a fourth generation big-cat tracker. "They really don't want anything to do with us, but they have learned to take advantage of us. These animals are so adaptive, [they] take advantage of a new habitat, essentially, and live right under our noses without us even knowing about it."

Now packed twice as densely in a city park as they would be in the wild, leopards are forced to venture out onto the streets of Mumbai, India, to find the several pounds of meat they require each day. "The leopards in Mumbai are absolutely incredible," says photojournalist Steven Winter. "In that park, they come out when it gets dark. And people live right on the edge of the park. I was there. People would do their walking, exercising, walk their dogs like we do in parks, and, boom, the sun goes down, and the habitat changes. It's then the leopards' area, and they coexist without really any major problems. It's an absolutely incredible situation."

Other creature incursions range from the nightmarish - a Burmese python emerging from a South Carolina toilet - to the near heartbreaking - a sloth fallen out of its tree in a Rio de Janeiro park crawling slowly but desperately along the street, the unvielding pavement crippling the abilities of its huge claws. But sometimes these wild interlopers are embraced by their adoptive human neighbors in a win-win scenario, like the 1.5 million Mexican freetailed bats that have long perched under the Congress Avenue Bridge in downtown Austin, Texas. When the dark clouds of the colony emerge each evening, it's a must-see for tourists and a welcome sight for the locals, who know the bats will eat up to 20,000 pounds of pesky insects along the Colorado River, saving billions of dollars in insecticides each year. "In fact," reveals executive producer Geoff Luck, "the Texas government has redesigned their bridges that they build on highways now to facilitate more bats to move into them."

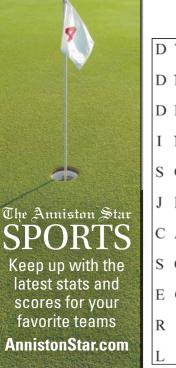

From their perspective, many forms the of wildlife see our city developments as an improvement over their natural habitats, at least when it comes to the abundance of food and water. One prime example are the coyotes that now live in most major cities of America. Some 2,000 of the wild canines occupy every part of Chicago, where they have shifted their day-

Host Boone Smith checks out the Mexican free-tailed bat living under the Congress Avenue Bridge of Austin, Texas, on "Urban Jungle," beginning Sunday at 7 p.m. on National Geographic.

hunting patterns to become nocturnal predators operating under the cover of night. The coyotes live longer in the city than they do out of town, and five times as many pups survive in these urban areas. Downtown is such a sustaining habitat, once there the coyotes never leave. "The cool thing is in a lot of these situations, these animals really have us figured out," adds Smith. "I mean, they've got us dialed. They know our habits, our routines, our noises, and they've totally adapted to that and are functioning, doing what they do. It really is amazing."
