Pillen (pronounced “pill-en”) is the first to push broadband in Lincoln. “I’m a year out of graduate school,” said Pillen, “and I’m facing the issue that many others are.” Pillen, a recent graduate of Harvard University, is facing the issue that many others are facing. He said, “I’m working on my dissertation on the right to push broadband in Lincoln.”

The right to push broadband

The right to push broadband is a fundamental right that should be protected by law. It is essential for the development of a digital economy and for the promotion of innovation. By protecting the right to push broadband, we can ensure that everyone has access to the internet, which is crucial for education, work, and communication.

As we push for broadband, we must also consider the privacy implications. The internet is a place where people share their personal information. We must ensure that this information is protected from unauthorized access.
