Uncle's expectations unreasonably high

DEAR HARRIETTE: My "Uncle Ron" raised his son and daughter all alone, and I think it was a struggle for him. Over the years, he put affection on the back burner and became results-driven. He did his best to make sure his children were A students, hard-working, well-behaved, well-spoken and aligned for success. I think his rigid parenting style took a toll on his son, my cousin "Matt." When Matt went away for college, he was no longer an A student. Although he managed to graduate, he struggled to find work afterward. Whenever we're all together, Uncle Ron is judgmental and doesn't shy away from sharing his disappointment in his kids. I can see how it affects my cousin, but I don't know what to say to my uncle. I chime in sometimes to remind him that Matt is on his way and has a good job now, but nothing is good enough for my uncle. I want to get through to him, but he's so stuck in his ways. How can I stop him from emotionally scarring my cousin further? — Never Enough

DEAR NEVER ENOUGH: Your uncle may never listen, but you can try talking to him privately. Point out that you know how hard he worked to take care of his children to prepare them to become responsible adults. Note that you think he did a great job, and add that you have noticed how harshly he treats Matt and that it seems to be negatively affecting him. Give Uncle Ron the example of how he publicly berates his son about his shortcomings in front of the family and how uncomfortable and embarrassing that is. Suggest that he notice the positive things about his son and celebrate those a

Power of pause important

Dear Annie: I read the letter from "Sideline Mom With a Heavy Heart" with deep empathy. My husband coached both of our sons, now grown men, in baseball, wrestling and football. While he was not as intense as the father described in that letter, he certainly had his moments.

Early on, I sat him down and said, "No one feels worse about missing a play or losing a match than our son does. From now on, we're going to use the 48-hour rule. For the first 48 hours after a game or match, the only thing you're allowed to say is, 'I love you, and I'm proud of you.' After those two days, when emotions have calmed and the disappointment has faded, then — and only then — you can talk about the game."

This approach worked beautifully. Our sons enjoyed playing sports. They went on to become state champions in wrestling and later wrestled in college. Most importantly, they had a positive experience and maintained a close, loving relationship with their father.

A few of my husband's coaching colleagues adopted the 48-hour rule as well, and they saw great results in their own families. I hope this idea might help "Sideline

Mom" and others facing similar challenges. — A Happy Mom of Husband-Coached

Dear Happy Mom: You have certainly learned the power of the pause. Taking a moment to reflect rather than react out of strong emotion is always a valuable practice, especially when it comes to parenting and coaching.

The 48-hour rule you shared is very wise. Giving children time to process their own disappointment before piling on criticism or analysis creates space for growth, resilience and trust. It allows love to lead the way, not frustration or perfectionism.

Thank you for sharing your positive experience. I hope it encourages other parents and coaches to see how important it is to pause and think before yelling, reacting harshly or sending a message they might later regret. In a world that often rewards quick reactions, your story is a beautiful reminder that patience, timing and kindness are far more powerful.

Your sons are lucky to have grown up in a home where love and support came first and it sounds like their relationship with their father is stronger because of it.
