We were incredibly fortunate to qualify for the national tournament in debate, two of eight youth in our category from across the state. With the tournament in Mesa, Arizona, the cost of making this opportunity a reality requires payment for housing, transportation, registration, and other personal needs. This chance for the school's national recognition is one of a lifetime, and we would greatly appreciate the support in getting there.

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

By Charles Apple | THE SPOKESMAN-REVIEW

One hundred and eighty-five years ago — May 26, 1838 — the U.S. Army began rounding up members of the Cherokee tribe in northern Georgia and western North Carolina to forcibly move them to empty lands out west. This was despite promises and treaties and even a Supreme Court ruling that guaranteed them their homes. About one-fifth of them would die en route.

A HISTORY OF BROKEN PROMISES

The relationship between European settlers in the New World and the Indigenous peoples had always been a shaky one. Time and time again, Native American tribes agree to treaties granting them land while also earmarking land on which settlers could farm, hunt, build cities and form governments.

But time and time again, settlers — and later, the young United States of America — would break those treaties and push Native Americans away from the areas the newcomers wanted.

America's founding fathers favored the idea of "civilizing" Native Americans, having them adopt western customs, dress, languages and religion. Some tribes did this more willingly and more rapidly than others.

In 1823, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the "right" of Indigenous people to live on their designated lands in the southern part of the country was a "secondary right" to the U.S. government's "right of discovery" on those lands. This made it even easier for settlers and speculators to seize Native American property.

Then, in 1828, gold was discovered in the Appalachian foothills of north Georgia — lands occupied by the Cherokee tribe. The next year, Congress passed the Indian Removal Act, allowing the government to negotiate with tribes for their relocation to lands west of the Mississippi.

Some tribes — the Choctaw and the Chickasaw — willingly moved, realizing conflicts with settlers would only get worse. Others, not so much. The Seminoles of Florida refused to leave and were forced out only after

Andrew Jackson

War hero and populist president who had teamed up with real estate interests to profit from illegal settlement of Native American lands.

Martin Van Buren

Jackson's vice president — and, in March 1837, his successor — continued Jackson's policies regarding Native American removal.

Winfield Scott

Commander of the roundup of the Cherokee. He ordered his troops to "show every possible kindness" and to protect the Native Americans from harm.

John Ross

Principal chief of the Cherokee Nation from 1828 to 1866. The U.S. government bypassed Ross in 1835 when it signed a treaty to relocate the Cherokee.

voluntarily leave their land and to head west. About 2,000 Cherokee did just that.

Three days later, 7,000 troops under the command of Gen. Winfield Scott began rounding up Cherokee from their homes at gunpoint and sending them to 11 temporary internment camps.

Some tribal members escaped the roundup by fleeing east, further into the Appalachians. The descendants of those Native Americans live today in the hills and valleys around what is now Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

Some of the Cherokee were loaded into boats to make the journey via the Tennessee, Mississippi and Arkansas rivers. Others marched by foot. The journey was badly organized and poorly executed. Drought lowered water levels requiring boats to be repeatedly unloaded and loaded again to avoid rapids and shoals.

Drought struck the region. Food ran short. Breaks were called in the forced migration, during which the Cherokee were imprisoned in military stockades along the way. Of the more than 4,000 that died during the migration, about 1,500 died in stockades.

Most of the Cherokee reached Indian Territory by March 24, 1839. They were promised food and supplies through March 1, 1840. About 16,000 Cherokee would eventually settle near the town of Tahlequah, in the foothills of the Ozark Mountains.

In 1987, Congress would designate a Trail of Tears National Historic Trail, stretching 2,200 miles across nine states.

a long and bloody war.

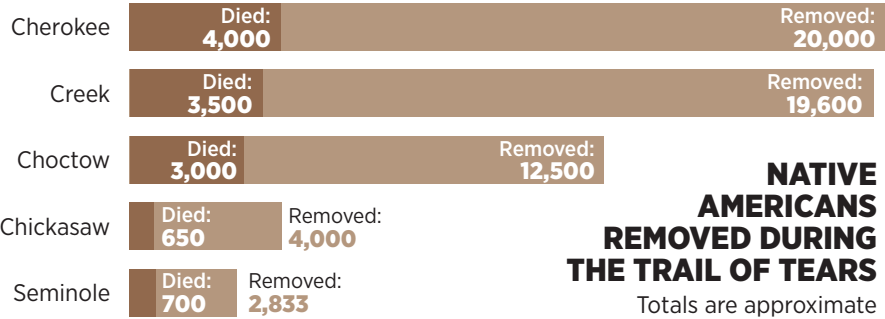

The Cherokee also weren't happy about leaving. The government worked around the unwillingness by signing a new treaty — the Treaty of New Echota in 1835 — but with members of the tribe who were not its recognized leaders.

Cherokee leaders including John Ross fought the treaty through the courts all the way to the Supreme Court, which sided with the Cherokee.

But President Andrew Jackson was determined to push the Cherokee off their land. "(Chief Justice) John Marshall has made his decision," Jackson said. "Now let him enforce it."

The government set a May 23, 1838, deadline for the Cherokee to
