The Wallflowers

1 (Wall)flowers in bloom!

In the late 1990s, your friends at the Weekender were serenading our girlfriends to the tune of “One Headlight.” But we could never match the artsy angst or the effortless cool of The Wallflowers’ lead singer Jakob Dylan. ‘Something yummi’ is going on

712 Night Market to bring fun, games and a bevy of food trucks every Saturday night

BY EARL HORLYK

On Saturday night, the Yummi Blox food truck lot will be filled with food trucks featuring different types of international cuisine, face-painting, arts and crafts, a bouncy house and, maybe, even a live DJ.

At least that is how Alejandra Amezuca was envisioning the 712 Night Market, which will be a weekly occurrence at the 700 W. Seventh St. food truck lot.

“I know big cities often have these exciting outdoor night markets with plenty of good food, a variety of vendors and family friendly activities,” she explained. “We wanted Sioux

City to have its own night market.”

Alejandra and her husband German Amezuca are already veteran food truck entrepreneurs, having started La Palapa, which features sweet, spicy and savory drinks, snacks and snow cones a person would find in an authentic snack bar in Mexico.

“I think this is our seventh season with the food truck,” Alejandra said. “Guess that makes us one of Sioux City’s ‘O.G.’ food trucks.”

According to German Amezuca, the couple had originally wanted to open a more traditional storefront eatery.

“It wasn’t financially possible for us at the time,” German

DETAILS

WHAT: 712 Night Market, featuring arts and craft vendors, face-painting, a bouncy house, live entertainment and food trucks with different types of cuisines.

WHEN: 6 to 10:30 p.m., every Saturday night

WHERE: Yummi Blox, 700 W. Seventh St., Sioux City

Alejandra Amezcua, co-owner of the La Palapa food truck makes a tamarind diablito in her truck at the Yummi Blox food truck lot in Sioux City. remembered. “I suggested a food truck might be a better option. Before I knew it, Ally was online, looking for used food trucks for me and her dad to refurbish.

“Once Ally sets her mind to something, she’s unstoppable,” he said with a laugh. “Ally’s a real go-getter.”

The same was true for the 712 Night Market.

“At home, Ally and I love watching these food documentaries on Netflix, which would show these big, bustling night markets on the streets of Mexico or California or around the world,” German said. “We thought about the idea for a couple of years. Like the food truck, once the ball was rolling, it was impossible to stop.”

“We may have had the night market in the back of our heads for two years but it seemed like it became a reality in two days, thanks to Ally’s hard work and vision,” German added.

Peggy La, who owns Yummi Blox with her husband John Keosa, nodded her head in agreement.

“The night market is all Alexandra’s idea and it is terrific,” La said. “I just own the lot. The rest is all her vision.”

Indeed, the night market will potentially open La Palapa up to a different audience.

7 • Weekender • 08.17.2023 • www.siouxland.net

While the Siouxland’s Choice Award-winning food truck is well-known for its Diablito (a refreshingly savory cocktail garnished with spicy tamarind candy and fresh fruit) and tejuino (made with maize, cane sugar, lime and salt), German said there may be an untapped market for La Palapa.

“People like our food truck because our customer base includes Latinos, Asians, Americans, Africans, you name it,” he said. “Who doesn’t want something cold and refreshing in the summertime? But we’d like to see La Palapa to grow some more.”

In fact, Alejandra thinks all of the night market food trucks can benefit from increased exposure.

“This is a one-stop shop when it comes to food,” she said. “You can have Mexican, American, Thai and Korean-infused food all in one setting. How convenient is that?”

German said customers have been intrigued to try foods from other cultures.

“I’ve tried African food and immediately noticed that some of their ingredients are very similar to what we’d use in Mexican food,” he noted. “The same is true with Asian food. The foods may be from different parts of the world but there are also a lot of similarities.”

“It also helps when people see international foods online or on TV,” Alejandra said. “They’ll say, yeah, I saw that on Netflix.”

“You gotta love (TV chef and host) Andrew Zimmern (‘Bizarre Foods: Delicious Destinations’),” La interjected. “He’s introduced a lot of people to unique foods over the years.”

However, the 712 Night Market will be much more than just food. According to Alejandra, it will be more like a weekly neighborhood festival.

“You can hang out for a while or you can stay for hours,” she said. “There will always be something to see, do and eat.”

Holding it on a Saturday night was an important part of the plan, German said.

“It wouldn’t work on a Friday night because parents might be too tired to go out,” he explained. “Since Sunday is a day off for many people, we think more families will come on a Saturday night.”

“Right now, the night market will be open from 6 to 10 p.m., every Saturday night,” German continued. “If there’s still a good crowd, we’ll stay open even longer.”

Which is something that Alejandra would find very gratifying.

“When we started La Palapa, it was a very small business and, I guess, it still is,” she said. “But if we can help other locally-owned, small businesses grow, Sioux City will become a stronger community.”

And what better way to grow an economy than with a vibrant night market?

“Everybody loves hanging out with friends and family on a warm summer night,” Alejandra said. “At the 712 Night Market, we’ll even do all of the cooking for you.”

ADVICE

ANSWERS FOR ALL YOUR WOES

DEAR ANNIE
ANNIE LANE

Extended family is too close for comfort

Dear Annie: I am currently married with no kids. I travel a lot for work and vacation. The issue is my wife's sister, her husband and their kids. Three years ago, my wife and I allowed them to move into our home because their living situation was not great. They shared a small apartment that was overrun with rats and cockroaches. We told them that they could stay until they were able to get back on their feet. This was only supposed to be six months to a year. Annie, it's been three years in counting with no end in sight.

This is the father's third marriage, and he has seven kids in total. The children rule the roost and are not disciplined. I am no longer their fun-loving uncle. We butt heads about everything. I find myself on the edge of screaming at them daily. When I get home from work, the house is a complete mess. They eat all the food I buy, don't clean and do not pay rent. They are on easy street, and I am paying for it.

My wife and I had decided to finally give them a "hard" deadline to leave this past spring. My wife's sister lost her job just before this deadline. She was employed three weeks later — while the husband has been employed this whole time — but the "hard" deadline came and went. Worse yet, my wife is completely on their side. She doesn't want them to be forced out because then she would be abandoning "family." I am at my wits' end and don't know what to do. A co-worker suggested that when I'm home, I should be in nothing but my underwear to make the situation uncomfortable for them so they will leave. I feel like I am completely out of options

The first step is to get on the same page as your wife. Explain to her that you are not abandoning the family — and perhaps brainstorm some other ways in which you can support them — but that you need to regain control of your home in order to preserve your well-being. Once you and your wife find your common ground, initiate the long-overdue conversation.

and have been actually considering this or worse. Please, Annie, what should I do? — Almost Au Naturel in Alabama

Dear Almost Au Naturel: Your co-worker's suggestion gets points for creativity. Unfortunately, it is also passive, avoidant and immature. A direct confrontation would solve your problem quickly, but it sounds like you are willing to do anything to avoid that.

The first step is to get on the same page as your wife. Explain to her that you are not abandoning the family — and perhaps brainstorm some other ways in which you can support them — but that you need to regain control of your home in order to preserve your well-being. TWEEN
12 AND 20
DR. ROBERT WALLACE

Should I turn her in?

DR. WALLACE: I saw my best friend cheat during a pop quiz in our summer school class last week! I feel frozen by what I've witnessed, so I haven't said anything to her or the teacher yet.

The funny thing is that this pop quiz doesn't really factor much into our overall grades; it's more practice for a more formal test that we're going to have soon.

On the one hand, I really don't want to turn my best friend into the teacher and risk ruining our friendship, but on the other hand, I don't want to condone cheating by simply looking the other way and doing nothing. Is there anything I can do at this point? — Wish I Didn't See That, via email

WISH I DIDN'T SEE THAT: You are indeed in the midst of a moral dilemma. Fortunately for you, as you mentioned, this was only a pop quiz that will have virtually no impact on her grade in this class.

Therefore, in my opinion, this provides you an opportunity to confront your friend directly without saying anything to your teacher.

Let your friend know exactly what you witnessed and how much it bothered you. Tell her directly that if you notice her cheating in class again, you'll have no choice but to inform the teacher. Then immediately follow that up by telling her that she's your best friend and you really want to help her. Ask her if you can help her to study for the future test or if you can provide her any other support that will help her become a better student so that she does not feel the need to go outside of the rules in order to try to keep up with the class material.

He's trying to manipulate her again

DR. WALLACE: My girlfriend has recently been contacted this summer by her ex-boyfriend. They've been apart for nearly a year, and I've been with her for six months.

Once she and I got together, and she got to know me pretty well, she opened up and told me about how verbally and mentally abusive he could be to her at times. She was close to his mother, so now this troll of a guy is telling her that his mother misses her and wants to see her again very much. Of course, this is all a new form of his manipulation.

How can I get her to realize this, and do it in such a way that I do not offend her? I also don't want to stand by and let this guy reenter her life simply to find a manipulative way to break us up so that he can try to pursue her again. — That Guy Disgusts Me, via email

THAT GUY DISGUSTS ME: You're wise to take measured steps carefully rather than try to tell your current girlfriend what to do here. You can start by saying that if his mother truly wanted to see her so urgently, she would have likely reached out to your girlfriend herself.

Another approach would be to involve a trusted adult, one your girlfriend will listen to. This may be one of her parents, aunts, uncles, teachers or counselors. All you can do is suggest going over this topic in detail with a trusted adult and see if she's open to the idea.

At any point if you try to tell your girlfriend explicitly what to do, or begin manipulating her in any way, you'll be playing a lighter version of his game. Stand your ground, maintain your integrity and provide her every opportunity to see through this nonsense. If, for some reason, she persists in engaging with him, this may tell you a lot about the stability of your current relationship.
