Trump says he’s the nation’s top cop

Some say men should get consent on video

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump asserts that he is the nation’s top cop, a claim that likely is not entirely accurate the attorney general.

From the Trump-cheerleading White House website side with the attorney general, describing him as the “Chief Law Enforcement Officer of the Federal Government.”

But the president’s claim is consistent with the robust view of the president’s authority many conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

But the president’s claim is consistent with the robust view of the president’s authority many conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.

Several veterans of President Barack Obama’s administration described Trump’s assertion as dangerous and simply wrong on the law.

Since the Senate impeachment trial ended with the acquittal of Trump, the president has used his public statements to express his displeasure over one of his allies in the Senate, Republican Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who voted against acquittal.

Several Democratic members of Congress have accused Trump of using the impeachment to punish his political foes.

Some conservative legal minds think Trump is right, but that’s better public policy to keep law enforcement at arm’s length.