Mining on Public Lands

The General Mining Act of 1872 is a federal law that authorizes and governs prospecting and mining on federal lands. This law states how to acquire and protect mining claims.

Under this law, all citizens are allowed to locate a mining claim on federal lands open to mineral entry. These claims may be located once a discovery of a valuable mineral is made.

Once the claim is established, the claimant has the exclusive right to remove and sell those locatable minerals.

Locally there are many active claims on public lands administered by the BLM Arizona Strip Field Office including gypsum and uranium.

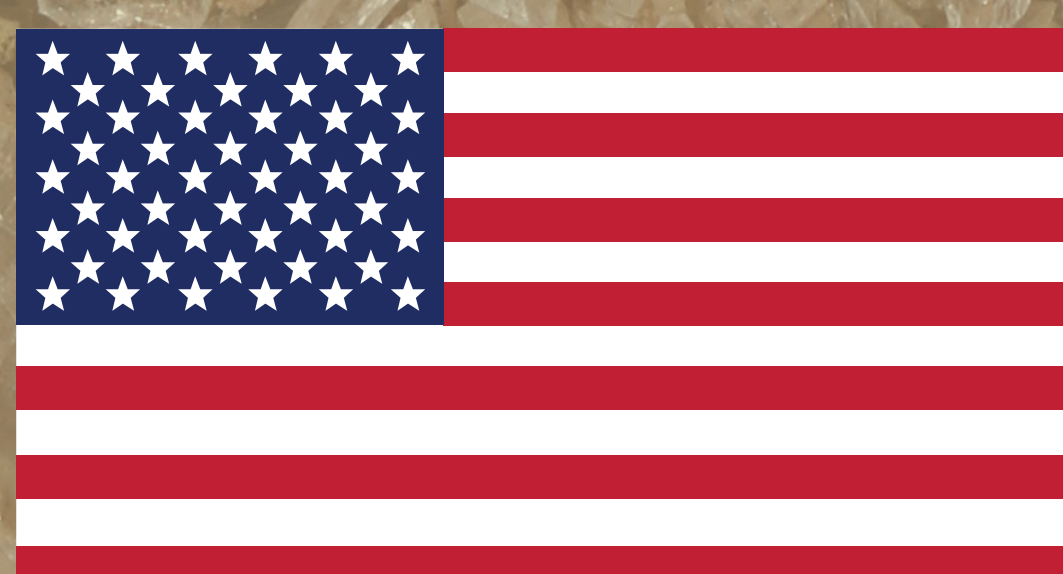

Responsible Use of Public Lands

Those who plan to mine for mineral extraction enter into an agreement with the BLM to restore the site to its natural condition upon completion of the project. This process, called reclamation, is accomplished by contouring the site and replanting vegetation. Once reclaimed, little to no evidence of the mining activity will remain.

Guidelines for Visiting

- Digging and mining tools are prohibited. This includes hammers, picks, shovels, machinery, etc.
