Clint Eastwood

OF (GENERAL QUESTION) ON (GENERAL QUESTION)

Q: I've been seeing frequent TV showings of the Westerns that Clint Eastwood made overseas and that made him a superstar. Was he still doing the series "Rawhide" at the time he did those?

A: For the first two of the three movies, yes. What's ironic is that "A Fistful of Dollars" (1964) originally was offered to his fellow CBS "Rawhide" star Eric Fleming, who turned it down. Another actor who rejected it was Richard Harrison, who reportedly was the one who recommended Eastwood to director Ser-gio Leone, and the rest is history. After several years of playing "Rawhide's" Rowdy Yates as an earnest good guy, Eastwood embraced the chance to play the darker shadings of The Man With No Name in the Leone pictures.

"A Fistful of Dollars" was enormously successful in Italy before it branched out internationally, prompting the sequel "For a Few Dollars More" (1965), though Eastwood initially hesitated to make it because he hadn't seen "Fistful" yet. The audience responded well to the latter film at a screening of a copy that was sent for Eastwood to view, convincing him to agree to the first "Fistful" follow-up.

"Rawhide" had been canceled by the time "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly" (1966) went into production, but Eastwood did some crafty bargaining before signing up to work with Leone yet again. In addition to a significantly higher salary from when he began the trilogy, his deal also encompassed two Ferrari cars and 10 percent of the profits that the movie made in its American run.

Leone wanted to reunite with Eastwood once more, on "Once Upon a Time in the West" (1968), but Eastwood turned him down — despite Leone traveling to Los Angeles to hand the script to him. The part eventually went to Charles Bronson, who had been sought by Leone earlier for "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly." However, Eastwood maintained his Western image with the 1968 releases "Hang 'Em High" and "Coogan's Bluff," and the genre continued to play a big part in his screen career.
