Kelly Clarkson hosts "The Kelly Clarkson Show"

featurestory

BY SARAH PASSINGHAM

Take a bow: 'The Kelly Clarkson Show' sings its swan song

Some people just have the gift of the gab, the ability to pick up a conversation with anyone and pull the fascinating stories from the most unsuspecting conversationalists. The best talk show hosts effortlessly welcome guests to open up about their interesting work or incredible lives before throwing to commercial. They make it look easy when it is anything but.

While not every celebrity has the hidden talents necessary to jump into daytime talk show hosting shoes, it has been a pleasure to watch Grammy Award-winning, double platinum-certified recording artist Kelly Clarkson ("A Moment Like This") helm seven seasons of "The Kelly Clarkson Show." The singer's show comes to an end on Tuesday, Sept. 1, on Bravo with a special hour of "By Request" performances.

The opening "Kellyoke" segment of the talk show has been a mainstay since it premiered in 2019 with a cold open cover of Dolly Parton's hit "9 to 5" that transitioned into a live in-studio performance. The first "American Idol" winner (always accompanied by her band, called My Band Y'All) returned to her roots by giving her own spin to other artists' songs each episode to great effect — the Kellyoke playlist on the show's official YouTube channel boasts over 11 million views. Clarkson even released an EP of covers in 2022, aptly titled "Kellyoke," that included six tracks reinterpreted by America's favorite vocalist.

For the series finale, Clarkson has planned to perform some fan-favorite tunes to send off the show, including some of her own biggest hits, like "Since U Been Gone,"

"Sober," "Stronger (What Doesn't Kill You)," "Piece by Piece," "Didn't I" and her latest single, "I'd Be Lyin'." "Golden," the smash hit track from Netflix's 2025 animated film "KPop Demon Hunters," also gets the Kellyoke treatment. Clarkson's two children River and Remy also make an appearance in the series finale.

It was first announced that "The Kelly Clarkson Show" would end with its seventh season back in February. At the time, Clarkson said in a statement, "stepping away from the daily schedule will allow me to prioritize my kids, which feels necessary and right for this new chapter of our lives."

Tracie Wilson, executive vice president of NBCUniversal Syndication Studios, said in a statement, "I'm grateful to Kelly for bringing her talent and energy to this. Her warmth, quick sense of humor and connection with people created a show that made fans feel seen, heard and a little better about their day."

Wilson went on to praise the crew, saying, "we couldn't have achieved the show's success without our exceptional showrunner/EP Alex

Duda ["The Tyra Banks Show"], whose vision, leadership and unwavering commitment across all seven seasons have guided us through unprecedented times and a cross-country move. Together with the producers, staff and crew, they created a legacy to be proud of."

"The Kelly Clarkson Show" struck a chord with viewers and goes out on top after seven seasons. On the eve of taping the milestone 1000th episode of the show in March 2025, "The Kelly Clarkson Show" was ranked the number two most-viewed hour-long talk show behind "Live With Kelly and Mark," and the only show in the category to not drop in year-to-year ratings, per Deadline.

'Black Sunday' adds extra thrills to a Super Bowl

As thrillers with football backgrounds go, "Black Sunday" is a clear leader of the pack.

Based on a novel by Thomas Harris ("The Silence of the Lambs," 1991), director John Schlesinger's 1977 suspense drama — which MGM+ shows on Monday, Aug. 31 — traces a Middle Eastern terrorist organization's plan to wreak havoc on the United States by eliminating many victims at one of the most American of all events, the Super Bowl. Achieving that aim will make use of another famous symbol, the blimp that hovers over the stadium during the big game.

Marthe Keller (who also worked for producer Robert Evans in 1976's "Marathon Man") plays the main representative of the enemies, who uses everything at her disposal to lure the blimp's personally troubled pilot (Bruce Dern, in a role simply made for him) into helping her arm the aircraft with a specially designed device that will launch thousands of lethal darts at the unsuspecting crowd packing the site of the gridiron championship.

Unfortunately for the villain but quite luckily for everyone else, the plot is uncovered in advance by an Israeli intelligence agent (an excellent Robert Shaw, in one of his first follow-ups to his mega-success in 1978's "Jaws 2"). He heads for Miami with his partner (Steven Keats, Charles Bronson's son-in-law in the 1974 film "Death Wish") to derail the scheme before it can be launched, quite literally. (Considerable footage was filmed, with NFL cooperation, during Super Bowl X in 1976.) With Ernest Lehman ("North by Northwest," 1959) and Kenneth Ross ("The Day of the Jackal," 1973) among its screenwriters, "Black Sunday" peels back the layers of its story steadily and smartly, letting the tension build at a deliberate pace that could make some viewers impatient, but there's a giant payoff once the various parties converge on the target location on the day of the game. The action picks up dramatically, with clever cinematography ultimately making Shaw appear to perform aerial heroics by transferring from a helicopter to the suddenly weaponized blimp.

The release of "Black Sunday" came several months after another imperiled-football-stadium movie, "Two-Minute Warning" (1976). That might have had an effect on the later picture's box-office take, but the two films are quite different, and effective in their own ways. "Two-Minute Warning" relied heavily on star presence (Charlton Heston, Beau Bridges, David Janssen, etc.), but "Black Sunday" counts on its actors disappearing into their characters to boost the realism, and that approach yields the desired results.

Also adding to the authenticity is the involvement of actual sportscasters Pat Summerall and Tom Brookshier, seen as Shaw's character relies on a CBS Sports remote vehicle to get a closer look at what's going on as the intended attack time approaches.

"Black Sunday" is an expertly made thriller, and even if it isn't a specific reason that security is high as the world watches one of the most popular contests in sports, it would be no surprise if it helps in keeping those in charge on guard.
