Cargill

Cargill ...Our History

Cargill Elevator Company enters the 1930s with an appetite for change. It merges various businesses and incorporates under its present name. Cargill, Incorporated, expands globally, opening new offices in Canada, the Netherlands and Argentina. John H. MacMillan, Sr., steps down due to health issues, and his son John H. MacMillan, Jr., assumes the presidency.

No longer content just to trade grain, Cargill wants to move it too. John, Jr., develops a new style of vessel — part tugboat, part barge. It's nimble enough to pilot waterways and big enough to move crops on a mass scale. Now Cargill can get more food to more people who need it. And not just people. Encouraged by W. W.'s youngest son, Austen, the company begins to manufacture Blue Square Feed in Lennox, South Dakota.

Responding to broad economic challenges during the Great Depression, Cargill makes the tough decision to cut salaries 20% and close some offices. It also establishes one of the industry's best retirement programs and creates a plan to avoid foreclosing on independent elevator owners and partners — highlighting the company's ongoing commitment to putting people first.

Rising Star Recognition

New employees can be recognized as Rising Stars during their introductory period if they receive a "Very Good" on their job performance evaluation and also must have perfect attendance to be eligible. Congratulations to all the Rising Stars!

Holly Sickles, Chase Parker, Dennis Douglas, Michael Lord and Alexander Carrington have done an outstanding job earning their Rising Star recognition. Their strong attendance, positive attitude, and ambition to learn their jobs have not gone unnoticed. They consistently demonstrate a willingness to grow, take on new challenges, and contribute to the team's success. Thank you all for your hard work, dedication, and commitment to learning. Keep up the great work, and congratulations on this well-deserved achievement!
