It was necessary to make the American government aware of the possibility of a forced ally and make it clear to the United States that we were not in a position to do so.'"

PHOENIX, March 3.—Nothing was finally settled in the legislature today. Most of the time today was spent by both houses in the committee of the whole, settling the most important measure one of the long calendar. One proposed constitutional amendment, was introduced by President Clarke of the measure, designed to prevent such congestion in the coming house. It proposes that the general appropriation bill shall be introduced as early as possible in the session and that no other legislation be enacted until it has been passed. Ruling Made by Chief Justice Marshall Is Precedent for Deferring Inauguration to March 5; Interval Not Recognized as Hiatus

It also disposes of the popular notion that the secretary of state has been president for a day in this interval. Chief Justice Marshall's ruling was made in a letter to John Quincy Adams, then secretary of state and who later became president, who asked for his advice.
