

Families no longer driving force for rise in border encounters

Adults traveling without children are driving the current rise in border encounters, a remarkable change in the demographics of migrants at the U.S.-Mexico border. When the Border Patrol saw a similar spike at the border two years ago, most of the migrants they apprehended were families traveling together, according to Customs and Border Protection data.

