

The Arizona University situated about a mile east from this city, viewed from the San Xavier hotel, presents rather a jagged and ungainly appearance. At the trestle work and scaffolding necessary in constructing the building, is still around it, but it will be removed, when the Arizona University building will appear quite different. At this time, certainly, "Distance does not lend enchantment to the view." Those who have visited the University pronounce it a fine and imposing structure, and one that reflects credit to the Territory and the Board of Regents under whose supervision it is now building.
