Jennifer Howell, director of Truett Seminary’s new master’s in theology, ecology and food justice program and World Hunger Relief’s theologian-in-residence, stands at the nonprofit’s “urban homestead” garden on Waco’s East Farm.

The program recently received a $2,000 grant from the Waco Tribune-Herald’s Keep Waco Beautiful program.

She said soil is often the best crop of all.

The program is set to start in September and will allow students to learn about agriculture and food systems through a hands-on demonstration farm in Elm Mott, just outside of Waco.

#FoodSecurity #UrbanGardening

Related Articles:
- New Truett program to examine food insecurity and agricultural issues
- Waco’s Urban Homestead addresses hunger and poverty through food sovereignty
- Truett Seminary launches new master’s program in theology, ecology, and food justice

Read the full article here: Waco Tribune-Herald

---

Truett Seminary’s newest master’s program digs deep into the connections between hunger, agriculture, and religion.

Students pursuing master’s in theology, ecology, and food justice at Baylor University’s George W. Truett Theological Seminary will spend most of their time at Waco’s East Farm, a Christian non-profit founded in 1979 where the church has not always done what it should have.

The program also works closely with the Baylor Collaborative on Hunger and Poverty. "It’s a spiritual discipline," she said.

Howell said it was her theology that "shows them pathways to solve" the issue of hunger.

The farm recently received a $2,000 grant from the Waco Tribune-Herald’s Keep Waco Beautiful program.

She said soil is often the best crop of all.

The program is set to start in September and will allow students to learn about agriculture and food systems through a hands-on demonstration farm in Elm Mott, just outside of Waco.

#FoodSecurity #UrbanGardening

Related Articles:
- New Truett program to examine food insecurity and agricultural issues
- Waco’s Urban Homestead addresses hunger and poverty through food sovereignty
- Truett Seminary launches new master’s program in theology, ecology, and food justice

Read the full article here: Waco Tribune-Herald