“When I first started most kitchens were either a basic L shape or U shape. There was a bread box and a pull-out cutting board as upgraded options. Internet sites such as Pinterest and television networks like HGTV have brought to life many options and ideas that many people would have not known were possible. We like that our customers can bring us photos of things that they like. It gives us a great feel for what they are wanting and what their style is. This is another difference in the overall process. Earlier we would make one design and then proceed with the job. It is very normal for us to work on two to three designs for clients before we have everything exactly the way that they want it,” Anderson said.
