

Our public promise

At the Wyoming Tribune Eagle, we aim to address the physical, social and environmental safety of our community through crime and public safety reporting. We strive to provide vital information so that you can make informed choices about the safety of yourself and your family.

We work to produce journalism that deciphers which national issues apply to you here in Laramie County, and contextualizes local issues without sensationalizing or reinforcing misconceptions about public safety.

That means holding authorities accountable when it comes to the judicial system, law enforcement, extreme weather events, the quality of public utilities, transportation, health care and trust within the community.

That also means sharing the many different perspectives of our neighbors in Laramie County, regardless of political, personal or religious ideologies.

On a daily basis, our crime and public safety coverage aims to inform you of the ever-evolving strengths and weaknesses of institutions meant to protect people. We strive to use publicly available data and community sources to show local trends and dig deep into the challenges community members are facing, and how they can be helped.

When threats to public safety are active, our staff works quickly and efficiently to get “need-to-know” information to our community. We strive to communicate where and what the danger is, prioritizing information from law enforcement and public safety officials. Once the threat has passed, we commit to follow up with additional coverage, addressing the cause and result of the event.

We aim to be transparent and fair in our reporting practices, telling you what we do know, what we don’t know, and what questions have been left unanswered or are still being asked.
